School for Visual Art (1939) had helped animation in non-ritual and ritual forms. Ritual forms are non-structural, involve less communication and less cognitive engagement. Ritual forms are non-educational, focusing on the performance of structures, not on the understanding of structures. Ritual forms are not conducive to learning, as they do not encourage critical thinking or problem-solving. Ritual forms are not suitable for teaching, as they do not provide opportunities for students to explore and discover new ideas. Ritual forms are not effective for research, as they do not allow for experimentation and innovation. Ritual forms are not useful for policy making, as they do not provide a basis for making informed decisions. Ritual forms are not adequate for activism, as they do not promote social change or political action. Ritual forms are not suitable for therapy, as they do not provide a basis for personal growth or transformation. Ritual forms are not effective for entertainment, as they do not provide a basis for enjoyment or leisure. Ritual forms are not useful for community building, as they do not provide a basis for social cohesion or collaboration. Ritual forms are not adequate for decision making, as they do not provide a basis for making informed decisions. Ritual forms are not suitable for education, as they do not provide a basis for learning and development. Ritual forms are not effective for innovation, as they do not provide a basis for originality and creativity.
